CONCLUSIONS

- In post cardiopulmonary arrest patients, certain malignant EEG patterns (burst suppression, unreactive background and low voltage background) are correlated with high serum levels of NSE and they are good predictors of poor outcome of these patients.
- Additional larger prospective studies are needed to confirm whether EEG may be a helpful tool for the prognostic assessment of postanoxic coma.